

New revest of the Sunak government after the Cass report that also warns about the risks of the social transition of minors, the so-called "alias identity" that has already been adopted by many Italian schools: in the classroom you will no longer teach that you can change sex and sex education will be calibrated according to age. And never without parental consent

After years and years of transactivists from associations such as Stonewall and Mermaids doing good and bad weather with their sex education courses in English schools of all levels, the government of Rishi Sunak announces today with Education Minister Gillian Keegan new mandatory guidelines for schoolchildren and students on these issues. In class you will no longer be taught that you can change your gender identity, as it has been until now -even without parental consent- given the ongoing debate on such a controversial ideology that the Cass report has given a ferous blow. 'Last year I was quite horrified to learn what was being taught at school,' says Sunak.

Children are children and must be protected by concepts they cannot yet understand and background. We will then return to teaching the biology of sex and not that gender is on a spectrum.

There are other important news: explicit conversations about contraception, sexually transmitted diseases, sexual violence and abortion can be proposed from the age of 13. First, that is, from the age of 9, we will talk about conception, birth and respect for the other, including suggestions on how to give voice to one's concerns. At 11 you can move on to thinking about what is sexual harassment, revenge porn, stalking, grooming and forced marriage.

Parents will regain control over their children: they will be able to view the material and choose whether or not to send them to class.

'Parents can be reassured once and for all that children will only learn content that is appropriate for their age,' Keegan said.

Gender Identity, Politics

From Gaza to the western birth halls, Judith Butler sees fascists everywhere

Fascists, of course, we feminists gender critical, "allies of the right and the Vatican" too. The Californian intellectual, renouncing all philosophical subtlety, compiles a political agenda that coincides with the platform of struggling college students. And he calls for an alliance between trans, antifa, pro-Pal movement, homeless, black people, migrants and even women -understood as one of the many minorities- to build "a radical democracy inspired by the ideals of socialism". An account of the Bolognese stage of his triumphant European tour

Perhaps today we could talk about the "Agenda Butler": its platform coincides perfectly with the student-fighting platform across the West, with little certainty about whether the egg or the chicken was born first. Of course Judith Butler is in all respects the mother of Gender Theory to
